We must be always seeking the most functional solution for the client’s situation. And that situation is the project. If I have a client that asks me to design a cake for their kids’ birthday party, but at the same time they also want me to write the invitations, then I can see a problem. Writing the invitations is not a core part of what I do, and I would be doing both jobs for them if they asked for that type of work. And at no time have they ever said “write us the invitations so we can also hire you to design the cake”. My client-designing and cake-baking skills and know-how are just as important as my invitation-writing skills. Now, if I have a client that just wants help with the cake because they’re too busy dealing with work and their kids’ other obligations to do it themselves, and also needs help with the invitations, then I can help out with both the cake and the invitations and they’ll likely be very happy. If they only ask me to design the cake, then I can help out with it even if they don’t need me to write invitations. So I won’t need to change my process 3e33713323
