
Mad Money Torrent ((FULL))

But once we get there, what do you want to do with the web? What do you want web pages to be? For me, I just want to make everything instantly sharable. Not just what youre sharing, but youre sharing with people you know and you trust. There are a million pre-existing content distribution systems you can use right now, that are really powerful and have tons of features. I just want to extend them to make them offer everyone with a magnet link the option of putting that link into a web page and sharing that link with their friends. Its similar to how youre on Instagram or Facebook, theyre great systems for sharing things with your friends. I want to take the web, which is designed for sharing content from the moment that it was created and build a content distribution system that uses magnet links. Then as people start doing that, the more eyeballs will get to the content that is out there. More people will come across great stuff that they might have never have even known existed. Im making a browser plugin right now to make it really easy for people to share magnet links, and I hope youll be able to use that plugin in the future. I think that thats the way that we come to the point where torrents become a part of the web standard. Right, I think that idea that you can share a magnet link is very powerful, and we know people use magnet links for things like twitter, and to share links on reddit and other kinds of sites. You already can share a URL with a friend, thats pretty powerful. But it would be great if, instead of sharing a URL, you could, instead of sending the URL to the person, send them a magnet link. So a magnet link is basically a string, so it contains the content that you want to share, and it contains a magic token, a magnet token. It looks like the kind of thing that you can make up in your mind, but its not. Its a base 50 character string with these 12 characters that lets it identify the torrent files that youre trying to share. So if youre doing it on Reddit, what a magnet link looks like may be random, but if youre doing it on web pages, theres something you should know that may be similar: the 12 characters that the torrent client sends over the network to the tracker contain a 64 character string that is the seed list for the torrent file. So if I had done my job, the seed list for the torrent file that youre sharing is the same the 12 characters that the torrent client sends to the tracker.

There are a couple of real Gotchas that Ive run into. In the past, I used to accidentally send things to people that I didnt intend to. I had a concept where I was gonna like you, and would put you in my friends list, but it wouldnt show up there. And then it would show up on my friends list, and theyd see it and I wouldnt know. I stopped that because its easy for that to happen, and for people to send me stuff, and I wasnt really cool with that. A good example was the other day I was planning on renting a U-Haul to like move my computer to Austin, and I have no idea what wouldve happened if I had just started web torrenting You could easily be seeding torrents to random people, or they could be seeding them to you; you shouldnt really be seeding torrents to random people, because you could go from rich to poor really quickly on a peer-to-peer network, and that doesnt really work very well. You also have to be careful about the size of your files, in particular if theyre being seeded. If I upload something that is gigantic and theyre going to be downloading it, you can deplete a significant chunk of your bandwidth really quickly. There are lots of little things that can go wrong on a torrent. In addition to that, the peer-to-peer torrent thing is really neat, but its really noisy. Like, theres no way of communicating your status without being in the foreground of the torrent. So when I decided to try it, I was using PeerBlock, and it was the best thing - there are lots of private trackers you can be subscribed to, which make it a lot less noisy. And I actually run that in a cloud instance for the status checks and stuff; its a functional application. Its a nice way to have your files, and it lets you say, Alright, I dont want to have a torrent client open, or a website that you have to click on to see if theres anything new. Its a perfect complement to having a site that you visit daily. 5ec8ef588b
